The information contained herein was obtained from the complainant who is the male head of the household.

The complainant has requested that his identity not be released.

PRE-ACCIDENT:

The complainant could not remember the exact date of the incident. He said it occurred sometime in December of 1993.

The subject glass baking dish was purchased, new, approximately five or six years prior to the incident at a retail discount department store. It was purchased along with a smaller glass baking dish of the same type and model. The complainant and his wife had experienced no problems with the subject dish prior to the incident.

They estimate that they used the dish approximately four to six times a year in the time they had it. It was usually cleaned by soaking in warm soapy water and a plastic scouring pad. The unit was not cleaned in an automatic dish washer.

The incident occurred around 5:00 or 6:00 in the evening. The wife was cooking a chuck roast steak in the dish. The dish had been in the gas oven for approximately thirty five to forty minutes at 375 degrees fahrenheit. The dish had no top on it.

ACCIDENT:

The complainant's wife took the subject baking dish out of the oven and sat it on a heating mat on the kitchen counter. Within a second or two of having sat the dish down, the dish exploded. No injuries were incurred. There was slight damage to the counter top and floor.

POST ACCIDENT:

The complainant feels that if a child had been in near proximity to the dish when it exploded glass fragments could have struck the child in the eye. He felt the dish posed a hazard for this reason and filed a complaint with the Commission.

The complainant contacted the manufacturer of the dish. The manufacturer's insurance company sent out a representative to examine the dish. The representative collected the dish fragments and took them with him. He told the complainant that they had scoured the dish too much, and this was the reason for the explosion of the dish.

The complainant could not remember the name of the insurance company and said he had lost the correspondence from them identifying the company and the company representative.

The complainant received a settlement sum ($450) from the manufacturer. A copy of the letter from the manufacturer was provided and is attached as attachment 4.

The complainant had a smaller dish of the same model that had been purchased along with the subject dish. He allowed CPSC to have the dish and it was sent to CECA under sample number S-830-6605. A copy of the Sample Collection Report and attachments are attached in attachment 3.
